9. Academic Profile

My field of teaching and research is the Middle East, which includes: The State of Israel, Iran and the Arab states, I cover the Middle East from varied viewpoints: political and diplomatic history, intellectual, social, cultural, military and intelligence history.

My approach in research has a multidisciplinary character; the emphasis is on combination between methods, deriving from history research, and those whose origin is in social sciences. This conceptual approach is reflected in the courses I teach, and in studies I conduct, emphasizing social and cultural aspects of the people and various ethnic groups who live in the region. My studies focus on Middle Eastern society, discussing and analyzing the history of social developments and diversions, focusing on the basic characteristics and processes shaping and affecting society. Most of my studies focus on connection between past events and basic problems societies in the Middle East must deal with today, and the ways each sub-group or specific ethnic group adopt to reality and/or circumstances.

My studies present and discuss a wide range of subjects: social and cultural history; historical development of intelligence organizations in the Middle East and North Africa; various aspects of connection between culture and society and between religion and state; coexistence, relations between groups; political parties and ideologies.

I find the combination between social sciences and Middle East studies natural and rewarding. A connection between general studies of society and specific region and culture studies enables a wide-range inclusive observation of the relevant disciplines, history, anthropology, political sciences and sociology, their interrelations and match points.
